From Rick and Nancy Renfro, authors of Johnny's Tavern, comes

INAPPROPRIATELY GOOD: CULINARY CLUE

While enjoying your evening at Johnny's Tavern, a kindly acquaintance invites you to a dinner party at a mansion on the West side. The house defines the term "inner beauty" – demure on the outside, but full of elegance and charm. The planner of the event, a heavenly hostess, has everything ready as you arrive. You mingle with the many other guests at the party – an over-the-river-type socialite who lets nothing and no one escape her attention, a professor who delights with his extensive wine knowledge, a guest who has volunteered to bartend and looks rather like a mad scientist with his bottles and tools. You get the sneaking suspicion that they all can clock out any time they like, but they will never leave. A bell rings and the humble chef brings out an entrée – familiar, yet exquisite. The food, drink, and conversation swirl together until you feel altogether transported. Finally, the hostess reveals a cake she baked. And as you slip the surly bonds of reality into a realm of culinary ecstasy, you begin to wonder...

what did it?

Who made your experience so #inappropriatelygood? Was it—

Lisa Wall, The Socialite in the dining room with the candlestick

Evan Epperson, The Mad Scientist behind the bar with the muddler

Natasha Kopriva, The Hostess in the pantry with the spatula

Bruce Owens, The Professor in the lounge with the corkscrew

Luke Nestler, The Chef in the kitchen with the paring knife or

Servers, Culinarians and Support Staff, the countless other guests you encountered?
